

PRAY . . .

For missionaries to find contentment in Christ, not in busyness, purposefully making time to dwell in Him.

For missionaries to follow the Lord and His voice and not to just “do” without listening to what God would have us do.

For missionaries to be people of fervent prayer and not delegate prayer to others alone but to lead by example.

For missionaries to cling to Jesus, turning to him first when problems and conflicts arise.

For healthy team and family relationships, as missionaries learn to submit to one another out of love for Christ.

For missionaries to readily identify local brothers and sisters in Christ who will labor faithfully alongside.

For missionaries as they counsel and weep with those who weep, especially during crises and pandemics.

For the Holy Spirit to comfort and encourage those who are forced to leave their places of service unexpectedly.

That missionaries will let Jesus define their identity, worth, and usefulness according to his purposes.

That missionaries would learn language with a sense of humor and with patience, constantly seeking to understand not just individual words and phrases, but the cultural meaning and worldview behind them.

That God would multiply the work of their hands like the loaves and fish.

That missionaries will seek God passionately and know the encouragement of his Spirit regardless of their circumstances.

That singles living far from family and support networks would find true community wherever they serve.

That God will give parents wisdom in raising their children in a second culture that is often hostile to Christian faith.

That missionaries on assignment in the U.S. will have the opportunity and words to share their experiences with others in a way that is meaningful and edifying.

That the fruit of Christian missionaries' lives and ministry will endure, producing great harvests of righteousness.
